

Brand transformation

<https://growfood.pro/>

Context Grow Food is a ready-to-eat meal delivery service founded in 2015 that scaled primarily through performance marketing. By 2022, the brand faced a classic growth problem: the product had become more complex, the audience wider, and the brand still lacked a clear identity. Despite having one of the lowest average checks in the category, it was perceived as expensive and underperformed on “tasty” and “varied” attributes.

Challenge The goal was to build a unified brand platform that could bring together different audience motivations under one narrative, simplify product navigation for users, and create a visual identity that would scale consistently across all touchpoints, from packaging to ad campaigns.

Strategy The core decision was to move away from fragmented need-based communication toward a universal lifestyle narrative. Research showed that the audience's main emotional drivers were not diets or fitness, but free time, energy, and self-care. The new brand message “Time to Eat” became a flexible system adaptable across audiences, products, and seasonal campaigns.

Execution We built a full brand platform covering positioning, tone of voice, messaging architecture, and guidelines. Redesigned the website and app UX to make product navigation simpler and clearer. The new visual identity was rolled out consistently across all channels: packaging, CRM, social media, digital, and product communication.

Results +200% brand awareness growth within a year after the rebrand. +40% customer base growth following the launch of campaigns in the new brand system. 2x product activity in the first months after launch, with results holding stable over the following year. The new brand platform became the foundation for new product launches, audience segmentation, and expansion into new markets.

Building from zero

<https://growfood.pro/>

Context Priem is a ready-to-eat meal delivery service launched in 2023 as a new vertical within the Grow Food ecosystem, built specifically for the budget segment.

Challenge By 2023, Grow Food had already expanded into big cities in Russia and into Madrid, Spain and was looking for ways to reach new audiences. The core GF brand had naturally settled into the mid-to-premium perception, so reaching budget-conscious customers required a separate product. The decision was made to launch a lean MVP with a straightforward value proposition: simple, home-style food at an accessible price.

Strategy The product and brand needed to serve one clear need: eat well without cooking, no complexity involved. Stripped-down by design, no ingredient filters, no overwhelming choices. Just a clean offer built around one headline: a month of food for $50. Everything from brand naming to UX was built to make that offer feel obvious and trustworthy.

Execution I built the brand from scratch, starting with research and naming. The name “Priem” works on three levels in Russian: a meal, a radio signal acknowledgment (“copy that”), and a sports term for a powerful move. All three felt right for a brand that needed to feel direct, familiar, and a bit bold. I developed the full visual identity, brand voice, guidelines, and designed the main storefront as a landing page, including UX and UI

Results Scaled to $20M+ revenue run rate within 1.5 years. Expanded into 15+ cities and regions in the first 6 months. Organic channels reached 50%+ of total revenue. Built a partnerships channel from zero to ~40% of total acquisition. Reduced CAC by 55% YoY while growing revenue by 90%. Increased brand awareness by 180% YoY.

What came next After Priem's successful launch, the company decided to expand the same model internationally. I helped adapt the brand for foreign markets, which led to the creation of The Meal, a separate vertical built for English-speaking audiences. Same core idea, new identity built to work in a different cultural and competitive context.
